Tandeus binnself acquired an important alcordness born of his task. He fretted now indiginantly against his doctor's unusual prescription.

"One restful day in the country," the great man said, "will do more for you than botties of medicine. A restful month would do better." Thadeus rebelled against the month, that would be unbearable. He knew that his nerves of late had been piling up misery in many unexpected ways, and he knew also that he must relax and find a changing of ways. He thought, as he stepped distastefully over the dust, of his own gloomy home in the city, with crabbed Hannah in charge of constantly changing maids, and he wondered after all, what his struggle for money had amounted to, Certain it was that it brought no happiness nor happiness in nature.
