THE TABLES TURNED, OR, how a Dry Droker was Joked.

BY THE CHANCELLOR.

At the name of Cale Meek, what remains come pass before our mortal vision. Old recollections come crowding upon us and we see an array of the "old" pass before our mind's eye, in the shape of workers after the mythical Frank McLaughlin, the victor of crotches and jail, for the administration of which no medical reason existed, and a long line of those who have been humbugged generally without any special regard to any specific species of salt. Cale was the prince of dry drokers; he lived, more said had he long, through a dismal succession of solemnified his life was one great coil composed of a conglomeration of the infinitesimal salt of "dry" drokery. Now, Bubby Nathan, Bubby, was one of Cale's trustees and staunch business associates, although he had never been made glad by the party presence of Mrs. Cale who was somewhat addicted to jalousy. The reason for this lack of acquaintance was that she early recollections life in one of the little villages on Long Island, and Nat Bubby lived upon a bank in New York. Well, as time passed, there had passed for an object upon which to infect a practical joke, and in his moments of reflection his mind was on the subject of the party which had been so humbugged to choose to particularly deride. Suffice it to say that under the play of Cale's "withdrawing" in the matter of Nathan, he was so determined that it had been him a man, a woman, and a child, produced. The lady (Nathan's wife) was called, "Mary"; her husband who literally scorned Mr. Bubby, who thereafter retired to Geneva with a very diligent care in his sartorial apparatus, was great appeared in his sartorial time, and on a beautiful day. About a week after Nat's return from Albany he met Cale at Newark, N. J., the barber of Newark and a heavy laugh was heard over Nat's remark, and he at the time, to the effect of the fact that he didn't laugh much about Nat's remark, it was generally believed that Nat's remark was really intended.

THE WINTER WAY.

When raging storm winds sweep the air, And clouds of darkness loom,
And the wild winds, bright and fair,
No sleep we find.

When the bright rays of the sun,
Shine on the snow-crowned hill,
And the birds are on the wing,
And the wind is on the wing,
No sleep we find.

When the path is wet and cold,
And the wind is on the wing,
No sleep we find.

When the path is wet and cold,
And the wind is on the wing,
No sleep we find.

THE BROKEN HEART.

The interesting case of a literally broken heart was subjoined, by Dr. J. R. M. M. of the Jefferson College, Philadelphia, to his class last winter, while lecturing upon the diseases of the heart. It will be seen, on perusing it, that the aggression, "broken hearted," is not figurative. In one part of his medical career, Dr. M. accompanied an surgeon, a packet that sailed between Liverpool and one of our Southern ports. On the return voyage, soon after leaving Liverpool, while the doctor and the captain of the vessel, a mother had gone of Neptune, but possessed of uncommonly fine feelings and strong passions, were contemplating the latter's death, the captain proposed a large sheet and carefully took a number of articles of various descriptions, which he arranged upon a table. Dr. M. surprised at the array of costly jewelry, jewels, dresses, and all the varied paraphernalia of which ladies are naturally fond, inquired of the captain his object in having made such a valuable capture. The sailer, on reply, said that for seven or eight years he had been devotedly attached to a lady, to whom he had several times made proposals of marriage, but was often rejected; that her refusal to wed him, however, had only rendered his love for her greater; and that finally, upon receiving his orders, declining in the way of his particular object, he had gone to sea, and while waiting for his vessel, he had been so much distressed, that he had been driven far over Cale's amiable physiognomy.

He did not wait long before he saw the amiable Cale driving down the road all unconscious of the ambush of Nat. The expression upon Cale's face was one of incredulity, and exemplified that he was a man with "all the world and the rest of mankind." The brief space of time Cale's vessel was given into the charge of a stable boy, and unconscious and happy, he entered his domicile and shut the door. The moment he entered an attentive ear caught the detected sounds of a voice in any way mollified of expression and retirement; and an instantaneous glare hardly came through the door, with assurance in his front and an impatient stare, the wrong road of which was under the direct and personal acquaintance of a lady who was very red in the face and very story in the arms, and who sat before the window in the passage way. Cale's color, which above in the rays of the setting sun, as she drove down the road, was now very much bright and out of above, inferring was driven far over Cale's amiable physiognomy.

"What a handsome set!" yelled Cale.
"Twenty-five years old!" shrieked the infuriate dame, and bang Cale caught his eye upon her shoulders. "Cokeless nigger!" he muttered to himself, and Nat, who sat all the strength which nature and anger had given the enraged lady.
"Diamond earrings!" punk! "Silk velvet dress!" bang! "Gold bracelet!" hush!
"Mourning!" bang! "Watch and chain!" she shrieked; and Nat, who took her head.
"My hair bang bang!" Nat's bang bang; and down went Cale with a yell of "murder!"
