How a Maid Proposed Marriage for Her Mistress.

By F. A. MITCHELL.

Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.

A gentleman, handsomely dressed, alighted from a railway train at a suburban station and, going out to where carriage stood waiting, looked about for one he expected to meet him.

"Passing a lady in which sat a young woman in the costume of a maid, she called to him:

"Be pardon, sir. Are you Mr. Jurnegan?"

"I am."

"I've been sent by Miss Whitehead to meet you."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, sir. Miss Whitehead is intending to come herself, but she was called away suddenly this morning."

"Since it was a four hour journey each way Mr. Jurnegan decided to stay. But what was he to do to amuse himself till tomorrow? He and Miss Whitehead were both interested in an estate that was in litigation. Mr. Jurnegan's father and Miss Whitehead's uncle had left their partners in business and had left their affairs in a tangle. Mr. Jurnegan seemed to have the best of the legal situation, and Miss Whitehead's attorney advised her to meet Mr. Jurnegan, whom she had never seen, and endeavor to effect a compromise. He strongly recommended her to marry him if she could. She had invited him to her home for a conference. As he rolled along he concluded to pump the maid.

"Does Miss Whitehead live alone?" he asked.

"Yes, sir, with a housekeeper for chaperon."

"Good mistress?"

"Very good—in some ways, sir."

"In what way?"

"Well, sir, there's nothing mean about her. She pays good wages and gives us days out quite often, besides lots of fine cut-off clothing. But she's very independent, does things her own way, and the neighbors call her 'frisky.'"

"There was nothing in this to help Mr. Jurnegan to an opinion as to whether he would be able to make a compromise favorable to his own interests or not, though the fact that Miss Whitehead was not mean looked well. On reaching her residence he was admitted and was shown to his room by a manservant. There he made his toilet and went down to luncheon. After that he had a whole afternoon before him with a thing to do. Going on to the piazza, he lit a cigar. The maid came out with perfumery, which she placed on a table near him.

"Miss Whitehead told me I was to do my best to make your waiting as easy as possible, sir."

"I don't know how you can do that better than by telling me about Miss Whitehead," he responded. "Sit down and tell me what she is like."

"The girl dozed at sitting herself near a gentleman, but agreed that if he would permit her to get her needle-work she would answer any questions he might ask. He gladly consented and on her return began his inquiries.

"How old is Miss Whitehead?"

"I don't know, sir. She might be thirty."

"Thirty? I heard she was not more than twenty-five."

"She looks it anyway."

"Good looking?"

"Oh, no, sir. Miss Whitehead is not good looking."

"Then she's very stupid to have so pretty a maid. The contrast is detrimental to her own appearance."

"Naturally the maid was pleased at this compliment. She bent her head over her work and said nothing.

"I fancy," pursued Jurnegan, "that your mistress must rely on you for more than the duties of a maid or she would not have trusted you with keeping the lace till her return."

"I sometimes act as secretary for her."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, sir, and she likes to talk over her business affairs with me. You see, she has no one else to talk with about them."

"She wouldn't talk with you very long about them if she didn't get valuable hints from you."

"At this moment a telegraph messenger boy came in at the gate and delivered a dispatch. The maid opened and read it.

"It's from Miss Whitehead," she said. "She is upstairs about her return and would like you to make her a proposition, through me."

"I told you so. She has recognized in you a head for business."

Mr. Jurnegan was a clear headed man and one who acted on broad and liberal principles. He laid down the business situation between himself and Miss Whitehead, showing that their interests were identical, that they must manage harmoniously the property in which they were jointly interested. He was proceeding when the maid interrupted him.

"It seems to me, sir," she said, "that by far the best arrangement to be made is for you and Miss Whitehead to marry. I hope you'll never tell me I proposed such a thing. If you do I'll lose my place."

"I had often thought of that myself," said Jurnegan, naturally surprised. "But I am opposed to marrying a woman older than myself. You say that Miss Whitehead is thirty and home-ly?"

"I am not a judge of beauty. You might think her fairly good looking."

"It takes two to make a bargain. What do you think Miss Whitehead would say to your plan?"

"She favors it."

"Yes, sir. She has told me several times that it's the only way of making a satisfactory permanent settlement."

"Oh, I see, Miss Whitehead, having such an opinion, profess to let it be known through another. I'm inclined to think she went away on purpose to enable me to get it through you."

"You're right, sir. The story about her aunt was made up."

"Well, upon my word! You're very frank about it. But, while Miss Whitehead, you say, favors a settlement by marriage, it doesn't mean that she would settle it by that way without seeing me, and if she sees me she might decide that no such settlement is possible."

"I think that part of it would be all right, sir."

"Why so?"

"Well, Miss Whitehead is a very sensible and a very practical woman. She is also peculiar and has some strange notions. She thinks that love often blinds us to our best interests. She went away resolved that if this settlement by marriage be agreed to by you her consent would depend entirely on my report of you."

"The deuce she did! That beats anything of the kind I ever heard of as coming from a woman."

"Miss Whitehead, as I told you, is very peculiar."

"I should think she is, leaving the question of her acceptance of a life partner to her maid."

"But, under the circumstances, don't you think, sir, that it shows a certain depth of wisdom?"

"I don't know but it does."

"Well, sir, since my mistress has left her part in the matter to me it is left to me. Now, what shall I say to her as to your part?"

"You can say that I am so astonished at this remarkable method of bringing about a settlement that I don't know what to say. It's my opinion that you have furnished the brains to concoct such a plan. If you were making the proposition on your own behalf I would say, 'It's a go.' As it is I must see Miss Whitehead before giving an answer."

"Very well, sir; I will telegraph her to come at once."

"How long will she be coming?"

"The will be here for dinner."

With that the maid arose, remarked that the perfumery on the table were of the latest issue and left him. Instead of reaching him he got up and walked about the grounds. He saw nothing, however, his mind being entirely taken up with this remarkable turn in his affairs. The maid had doubtless been instructed to say that Miss Whitehead was older than she was and plain looking. It would not do for her as her mistress's spokesman to say that she was young and beautiful. He was very impatient to see this practical and peculiar lady and shepherded her so that he would find her propositioned. She much depended upon whether he could bring himself to marry her. But he could not divest himself of suspicion at the way her maid had acquitted herself of so delicate a mission. Indeed, he was remarkably pleased at both the plan and the manner in which it had been carried out. But the as yet unseen Miss Whitehead would her appearance correspond with her talent for diplomacy or her maid's diplomacy?

Every ten or fifteen minutes he took out his watch to note the time, which dragged heavily. Between 5 and 6 o'clock he went to the house and asked a servant what time dinner would be served. He was informed that Mrs. Whitehead usually dined at 7. Then he inquired if Miss Whitehead had returned. There was no need for him to ask this question, for he had been watching all the afternoon to see her drive up. When he received a negative reply he sent for the maid-secretary and asked her if she were sure her mistress would return in time for dinner.

"She will surely be here, sir," was the reply. "I think it is time for you to dress for dinner, sir. Miss Whitehead always expects her guests to wear evening dress for dinner."

With that Mr. Jurnegan went up to his room. It was in the rear of the house, so that he could not see Miss Whitehead's arrival, but since her maid had so definitely informed him that she would come in time for dinner he dismissed the matter from his mind. At half past 6 he heard carriage wheels rattling on gravel. His heart throbbled. She had come.

A few minutes before 7 Mr. Jurnegan went downstairs. At 7 punctually the butler announced dinner.

"But where is Miss Whitehead?" asked the guest.

"You will find her in the dining room."

Thinking the lady had naturally put off her meeting till the last moment from motives of delicacy, Mr. Jurnegan went into the dining room. A young lady in evening dress advanced to meet him. He stopped and looked upon her, surprised. He saw the maid-secretary in the costume of her mistress.

"Your mistress was not arrived after all, I suppose, and you are to take her place."

"Disappointed? I'm delighted!"

"I will not deceive you any longer. I am Miss Whitehead."

Jurnegan stared at her in mute astonishment for a few moments, then when he found his tongue said:

"You proposition is accepted."

"Caruso and the Tax Collector."

"I was dressing for 'Pagliacci' when a man walked into my room, tapped me on the shoulder and said, 'Give me $100.' I looked at him and asked, 'What for?' He replied, 'Income tax.' I was already late and said: 'Come again. I have not got the money here.' Whereupon, he produced from his pocket a paper, apparently a warrant for my arrest. This seemed to me to be carrying the joke too far, and so I asked the manager to be kind enough to pay the man the money. He said at once, and the good income tax collector replied, 'And now my I have a seat to see the show?' And he got it. That's London."
