The Latin phrase "sub rosa" is used in elegant speech to indicate secrecy.

The first rose that ever was seen was given to Harpocrates, the god of silence.

At length came a man wiser than all the rest asking for admission.

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

When I have a sick headache I know exactly what will happen when Mr. Bowser reaches home.

"What did I have to do with it, Mr. Bowser?"

"Weren't you right here all the time? Did I do it? Did baby do it? Did some of the neighbors come in and knock it down with a crowbar?"

"It fell because it was poorly put up in the first place."

"It fell, Mr. Bowser, because you got the step-ladder and climbed up through the scuttle-hole and went walking across the joists in the attic. I expect to come home any day and find the house in ruins."

"But Mr. Bowser goes even further than this sometimes. One day a high wind blew down a portion of the back porch, and when he came home he stood and gazed at the wreck for a moment and then turned on me with: 'Well, what else could have been expected?'"

"What do you mean, Mr. Bowser?"

"Oh, it's all right! You just keep on and see how you will come out!"

"But did I blow that fence down, Mr. Bowser?"

"Oh, it's all right! You just keep on and see how you will come out!"

Cyrus the Great.
"After they had crossed, Croesus commanded his army to march on in the direction of Media. They had not gone far before they met the army of Cyrus, who, upon hearing of their coming, had started out to meet them. At first they met, and fought all through one day, but they were both recalled their troops, but when morning came neither army seemed inclined to resume fighting. Croesus, thinking he had thwarted Cyrus' idea of invading Lydia, returned to Sardis and disbanded his army. Cyrus gave him time for this, and then advanced to besiege the city. A large wall encompassed the city, except in one place, where there was a very high and rocky cliff. Cyrus sent his men to examine the walls, and see if there was any place where they could get into the city. The men returned, and said there was none. He then offered a large reward to any one who would discover such a place. Soon after this, one of his officers saw a Lydian coming down the cliff after his helmet, which he had dropped. The officer watched him until he returned, and then reported the matter to Cyrus, who at once proceeded to take his army into the city by this way, and before Croesus was aware of their presence they were in full possession of the city. Croesus was taken prisoner, and was treated with great respect, and afterward Croesus and his friends, and accompanied him on several of his expeditions.
Cyrus went on with his conquests in Central Asia, and at length was ready to undertake the conquest of Babylon. This was a city of immense extent. It is said to have been about four times the size of London. The city was situated on the banks of the Tigris, but the city walls were built up on either side of the river, so that if an army came up the river, it was impossible for them to enter the city. Cyrus divided his army into two divisions, one of which was placed where the river entered the city, and the other on the side where it flowed out. He then despatched his Indian mercenaries, and the cavalry of the city, and dug many others, until he could turn all of the water of the river out of its course. This he did, and then took his army into the city by the old river bed. As soon as Cyrus had taken Babylon, he liberated the Jews, who had been held as captives for about seventy years.
Cyrus now found himself sovereign of nearly all of Asia. He had been engaged in conquests for about thirty years; however, he thought that he would make one more invasion, this time into Scythia. Scythia was a country lying to the north, and divided from his dominions by the Araxes river. Cyrus, therefore, planned to construct a bridge by which to transport his troops. While he was engaged in constructing this bridge, ambassadors from Tomiris, the queen of Scythia, arrived. Tomiris wanted Cyrus to invade her dominions, but said that if he was still determined to come, that he need not take the trouble to build a bridge, for she would withdraw her troops three days' journey into her own country, and wait for him there; or, if he preferred, she would cross the river and meet him in his own country. Croesus advised him to accept the first offer, and also to advance three days' journey into the enemy's country, there leave a small detachment, with the supplies, etc., and then fall back with the main body of his army to the river. Cyrus followed his advice. The Scythians came on and meeting with the small advanced division, and supposing it to be the main part of Cyrus' army, fell upon it and easily overcame it, and took all of the supplies. They then gave themselves up to feasting and drinking, when suddenly the main portion of the Persian army returned, and defeated them with great slaughter. The commander in chief of the Scythian army, the son of Tomiris, was taken prisoner. Upon hearing this, the queen sent a second time to Cyrus. "Thrice she stated that if he would liberate her son and leave her country, he might depart in peace; but that if he persisted in coming on, she would call out the rest of her army and utterly destroy him. Cyrus determined not to give up the contest. Meantime, the queen's son had been killed, and the Scythians were watching a chance when none of the guards were near, he killed himself. When the two armies approached each other, the archers opened the battle, but when their arrows were all gone, they fought hand to hand. The Persians fought bravely, but they were slain in the enemy's country, and behind them was a deep river. For some time there seemed to be little advantage on either side, but it was finally evident that the Scythians were about to give up. When night came on, the Persian army was found to be almost wholly destroyed. Cyrus was killed, and his body was taken to Tomiris. Then ended the life of Cyrus the Great. Cambyses, his son, who had been appointed as regent in his absence, succeeded quietly to the government of his vast dominions.
The Women's Christian Temperance Union, in session in Boston, re-elected Miss Frances Willard president.
